noted. If bump feeding results in saving even one piglet per sow each year, the producer stands to gain in the neighborhood of $200 per animal, depending on the market price, without changing herd size or genetics. "This could be huge," she said.

However, Levesque admitted, "The cost of changing the barn to allow us to phase feed is phenomenal." The economic benefit must justify the cost of retrofitting the barn and changing the way things are done. To determine whether phase feeding is cost-effective, research trials using at least 100 animals of equal age per treatment are necessary. Doing this research at commercial facilities is expensive, Levesque explained. Therefore, proof-of-principle data must be gathered to justify moving to large-scale industry trials. The upcoming SDSU Swine Education and Research Facility to be completed by 2016 will allow Levesque to expand this research and to determine repeatability. "I can also follow those piglets to market to complete a full-scale economic analysis," she added. "It's about having access to a lot more animals which allows us to do much stronger proof-of-principle trials that will help the industry decide whether there is potential economic benefit in moving to phase feeding." SDSU

This sow farrowed in mid-January and is part of a study to determine whether a diet formulated for the mother's needs in the last trimester will produce stronger, more vigorous piglets.
