Rahn Family Restores Abandoned Cemetery

Surveyor's stakes and huge boulders mark all four corners of the cemetery plat. The closest marks the north-west corner.

Descendants of German immigrants John Adolph Rahn and his wife Augusta, who settled in Yankton County before statehood, have succeeded in restoring a family burial ground established as early as 1877.

Through the years, tenants had removed the boundary fence and grave markers in the tiny cemetery, and crops had encroached on all sides. The only original feature remaining is an 8-x 12-foot concrete slab which was placed many years ago by J. Adolph Rahn, Jr., son of the homesteader, to protect the graves of four family members. They are identified by metal name plates which read "In Memory of Mother" (Augusta Rahn), "Emil" (son who died by drowning), Herman (son) and "Annie" (daughter who died at 16 in a farm accident).

Margaret Rahn, daughter of J. Adolph Rahn Jr., lives in Yankton. In early March this year, cooperating with her nephew Rodney Rahn from Minnesota, she arranged to have the tiny cemetery resurveyed by a Yankton firm. The remote plat had been surveyed in 1940 for the WPA Graves Registration Survey program but it had not been officially recorded. Because of its remote inaccessible location, the tiny .17 acre plat eventually was forgotten, lying as it does far from the original homestead.

Fortunately Margaret had the original WPA survey map in her possession, and using as reference points two fence posts with dates "1914" stamped in concrete, surveyors were able to successfully complete their work, now recorded in the Yankton County Government Center.

The new map shows five adjacent rows with 18 lots in each. According to the 1941 WPA Survey, possibly as many as 20 are filled. Among them are the four mentioned above, one member each of the Bohman, Klaught, and Kanudel families, eight Braunesreithers, five Rahns, two Schaws and three Winters.

On March 13, 2015, Rodney

Rahn obtained nearly four tons of rocks and huge boulders from a local Yankton firm, and with Margaret looking on, moved them more than a half mile across a field (no road) with a hydraulic trailer. Using a skid loader, he then placed them as protective boundary markers on the four corner of the newly surveyed cemetery.

The Rahn Family Cemetery lies on a gentle rise near the corner of a field bordered by a picturesque winding creek lined with occasional trees. The creek, which is normally dry, runs diagonally north-west to south east through family land, which remains in Margaret Rahn, et. al's, hands. Because of her and her nephew's concern and perseverance, the family cemetery, which served not only the Rahn family but also relatives and neighbors, is now permanently on record and protected.

The Bookworm ... For Kids

'Trap' A Spooky Summer Tale

"The Trap" by Steven Arntson; © 2015, Houghton Mifflin Harcourt; 247 pages

BY TERRI SCHLICHENMEYER

The summer stretches for miles, and you've got plans.

You're going to pack each day with as much fun as you can. It's gonna be great — although, admit it: by the time summer ends, you'll be a little bit glad to go back to school, won't you? That's the way four young friends feel, but in the new book "The Trap" by Steven Arntson, they have to make a few things right first.

Carl Dunn didn't seem to be a diary-keeping kind of kid.

There was once a time when he didn't seem to be the bullying type, either, and almost-seventh-grader Henry Nilsson remembered those days. Now, Carl "was the worst bully" in their corner of Iowa.

Henry would've totally avoided Carl if possible, but Carl was big brother to Henry's best friend, Alan, and in that late summer of 1967, Alan was worried. Carl had been skipping baseball practice and there were nights when he didn't come home. That wasn't at all like Carl; stranger still, he was journaling and what he wrote sounded dangerous.

And that was why Henry, his twin sister Helen, Alan, and Helen's best friend Nikki were on their bikes in the woods at a campsite where Carl had been. They were looking for clues to his odd behavior when Henry found a book buried in a box beneath a pile of moldy old science fiction novels. "Subtle Travel and the Subtle Self" had a plain cover. Henry put it in his rucksack because he liked to read.

That night, cracking the book open, he discovered something amazing.

At first, it didn't make sense: the book instructed readers to recite some numbers, then "using your eyes, rock yourself" to step out of the physical body. When it worked, and Henry met Carl while walking around in a parallel world, he couldn't wait to tell Helen and their friends so they could do it, too. Meeting with the author's widow made the trick even cooler — until she invited the kids to a graveyard and Henry's other body got ensnared in a ghostly Trap.

That's when Henry knew that getting out wouldn't be easy...

No, your eyes aren't deceiving you: "The Trap" has a very definite Stand by Me vibe. It's also reminiscent of old '50s sci-fi novels and every other middle-grade four-kids-bored-with-summer story you've ever read — only a little bit sharper.

There is, in fact, a big creep factor inside this book that will appeal to kids with good imaginations, and a thread of sweetly awkward romance to soften the story. Author Steven Arntson then further sets his book apart with parents that are more than just caricatures and a kid-centric ending that also feels very grown-up (hint: it's not necessarily a happy one).

I think that if your child enjoys science fiction but wants something a little more solid, or if you're looking for a quick, decent read yourself, you can feel good choosing this one. For fourth-through-seventh-grade readers and adults alike, "The Trap" is a book to get caught in.
