Change in Public Discourse on Aging

BROOKINGS, S.D. - According to a recent study, media and advocacy organizations provide fractured and inconsistent information about aging and older adults.

The study, conducted by the Frame Works Institute, focused on how media and advocacy organizations present information about aging and older adults.

"There are six common narratives emerging from public discourse on aging and older adults," said Leacey Brown, SDSU Extension Gerontology Field Specialist.

These narratives include;

1. Throwaway generation: stories of elder abuse and discrimination;
2. Vibrant senior/Independent senior: idealized representations of the aging process;
3. Aging workers: older people in and out of the work force
4. Demographic crisis: looming social problems;
5. Government as a solution: how government can address challenges; and
6. Government as a problem: failed social policy and economic insecurity.

"Discussions about aging and older people offer an incomplete picture of the situation whether it is positive or negative," Brown said. "What's more, these incomplete narratives could have dire consequences on how we experience aging."

"We have an amazing creative and innovative capacity. As our media and advocacy organizations urge us to take action with incomplete narratives, we must push back and demand additional details," she said. ■iGrow
